MUSIC MADE BY BALALAIKA

Instrument Holds Chief Place in Czar's Court Orchestra—Now Has But Three Strings.

In its primitive state, the balalaika of central Russia was of ordinary deal. Its strings were of catgut, and were from five to seven in number.

The balalaika as reconstructed by Russian Musical Instrument.

M. V. V. Andreeff is a more elaborate affair, and the instrument in its new form now holds chief place in the czar's court orchestra.

Amongst the alterations made by M. Andreeff are the addition of a neck and the reduction of the number of strings to three.

The balalaikas are the triangular instruments shown in the photograph. The oval instruments are domras, several of which (and a dulcimer) figure in M. Andreeff's balalaika orchestra, which is now appearing in London.

NEW PRODUCT IS VALUABLE

Resinit Well Adapted for Impregnating Porous Substances to Render Waterproof.

Resinit, a new product, is described by H. Lebach, a German, as similar to glass, celluloid, and hard rubber, but superior to these and other substances for many uses. It seems to be adapted to a great variety of purposes. It differs from shellac and other natural resins, as well as from various artificial resins prepared from phenols and aldehydes, in being slow burning, infusible, insoluble, and unaffected by acids and alkalis. A mixture of crystallized carbolic acid and a 40 per cent. solution of formaldehyde is heated with potash, soda, or other alkali or neutral salt. The product is a yellowish, mobile liquid, which is an impure resin with much water, and is adapted for impregnating porous substances, like wood and paper, to render them hard and waterproof. Distilling off the water leaves a viscous liquid of many possible applications. When the thick liquid is heated for a certain time to 175 degrees Fahrenheit, and then to about 400 degrees, it is changed to a glossy, vitreous solid, which is pure resin—red, brown or yellow in color, transparent or translucent, and having a conchoidal fracture. It can be dyed and cut, turned and polished. Its great hardness and slight brittleness are unfitted for some purposes, but a more elastic and easily worked material can be had by simply mixing the pure resin with kieselguhr, talcum, or other filler.

Ross Cheshire, of Nashville, was here a few days last week the guest of Miss Mabel Wilson.
